

To be a high school senior is a goal in itself. Finally you have attained the prestige and superiority that you have respected since you were a sophomore. In achieving your goal as a senior you have also been working for even higher goals such as a college education, vocational training, or marriage. As your high school career ends, you continue to strive for these higher goals. You feel your experiences in high school have helped you to climb the ladder in reaching your goals.

Academically your high school education has given you the knowledge you need to be an intelligent adult. A variety of subjects has helped you to choose a field of interest and you have been guided toward this field.

You have received a well rounded education scholastically, but you probably feel you have learned more about people than you have facts. Even in the classroom you have observed a variety of personalities and you have learned the individual characteristics of people. You have tried to make yourself a better person by observing the actions of others.

Outside of school you have communicated socially with your classmates. You learn more about them in an informal atmosphere where the classroom stuffiness is gone and their true self is exposed. Communicating with others in extra-curricular activities makes you a better balanced person.

Academically, psychologically, and socially, high school has been your greatest help in reaching adulthood.
